Aug '19 - Today W Trek Team Leader, buildOn & Salesforce

Chipoza, Malawi

Participating in a volunteer project to build a school in one of Africa's poorest countries, Malawi, to offer the gift of education to underpriviledged children. Joining a team of 15 volunteers in late October 2019 to go on-site and build the next buildOn primary school in the Kasungu region, which will end up serving more than 200 local students.

Successfully fundraised 15% ($6,000) of the total team goal in less than a month, through various communication campaigns from social media outreach to internal company prensentations. We also developed a set of rewards to incentivize more donations.

The project does not only consists of building a school but also maintaining it while educating the local community, therefore improving their lives for the long term. We're also conducting an adult literacy program to help them run a business to finance the school costs across many years. Furthermore, we'll be testing a prototype using the Salesforce Platform for Change to collect data about the community, the school, and students. Note that it's a major struggle to collect data in the field for nonprofits in disconnected areas; it's still mostly done with pen and paper. We'll be sharing of our findings with the government of Malawi, with whom we're collaborating.

The first trek will kick-off the school construction with a groundbreaking ceremony. We will also test the Platform for Change prototype. We will then go to the Chipoza community and stay in local families' houses. The project will continue further with other treks scheduled for the following months to finish the school construction and to optimize the data collection prototype.

Member & Volunteer, Wowen in Cleantech & Sustainability San Francisco, US Women in Cleantech and Sustainability (WCS) fosters an influential network of professionals to further the roles of women in growing the green economy and making a positive impact on the environment.

Volunteering and participating in the bi-weekly events they're hosting. The last event was about how to fight food waste in America. The VP of Operations from Imperfect Food gave us an interesting presentation about the challenges of foodwaste. She notably highlighted that 43% of the wasted food in the US is from households. There is a lack of education about food resulting in a lot of waste. She also mentioned that Hunger was not a production issue but a distribution issue.

Women in Cleantech and Sustainability (WCS) also offers a Mentoring program for women who are willing to pursue a career in CleanTech and Sustainability that I'll join in November. The mentors, women and men, have at at least six years experience in the clean economy and wish to help advance a new generation of women in the field.

Marketing & Project Manager, Scality

San Francisco, US

My role as Scality consists of 3 main aspects:

- Act as a project manager of a 10-people team to increase team's eficiency and focus. I've led the marketing team to shift to an agile methodology: our work is cadenced around 2 weeks sprints using a project management tool, Asana. The project management role consists of having visibility on ongoing projects across the team and support the members if there have any blockers by communicating with the right stakeholders.
- Creating weekly and monthly reports for the executive team about marketing performance using google analytics and other analytical tools. I try to highlight actionable insights to help them make data driven strategic decisions.
